

A New Mind for the Classroom: Right-Brain Thinking for All Curriculums

with instructor Stuart Schwartzman, Ed.D.

Graduate Course Number EDUC 0595 3 Credits

Recent brain function research suggests methods for teachers to better serve their diverse student groups. The inclusion of alternate of learning devices, for a diverse student population, necessitates an understanding of the right-brain thinker and the need for right-brain activities for all students. Spatial, synthetic and non-linear learners, so underappreciated in too many school districts, often employ the right-brain thinking. The consideration of the communication in the classroom, between and among the sexes, between multicultural groups, and within a homogeneous or heterogenous setting will follow from the initial lessons. Teachers should feel better empowered to tackle challenges such as classroom anxiety, standardized testing strategies, and critical thinking embedded curricula. Teaches will return to their assignments with immediately usable methods and materials.
